

Richard Duke
June 2007

Your kids 2 -- helping Louisa
Working with the medical folks . . .

This hippo was leasurly munching on the lilly-pad-like vegetation int this pond. He has a friend who helps pick insects off his back.
Do you know who it is?

Giraffe are among my favorite of all the African wildlife. I particularly liked these two babies resting in the shade.

Just a photo of a guinea fowl. These little fellows scurry about like chickens on the African grasslands.

Now if you look very carefully at the tiny dots at the bottom of this tree--That's Louisa and Meagan! These baobab trees are famous in the lowlands of Zambia and spectacular to see.

PS--It's nearly two hours after sunset already over here in Zambia. The moon is nearly full. You might want to go outside in about 6 hours to take a look.

Then as night began to fall, the guides switched on powerful spotlights looking for the big cats that hunt at night. Although the attached cat is not very big, it was my first time to see it. I think it is called a genet.

Perhaps we will see something bigger later on in the drive.

The sun was nearly below the horizon highlighting the mane on this zebra.

Here's a yellow-billed stork taking a big yawn--or maybe it was just a big bite.

I just noticed the time needed to be reset on this computer so now it's right: 6:09 pm Friday night. Everyone arrived safely to the Flatdogs Safari Camp on the bank of the Luangwa River. Here's a photo of part of our group getting ready for a four hour ride through the park. I wonder what they will see?

I forgot to tell you part of the story. Let me back up to our last clinic way up north in Luapula Province. Here's a picture of Justin with the VBS kids.

Here are Hannah Ogburn, Olivia Hawkins, Rachelle Martindale, and Alana Smith standing near one of the signs at the entrance to the South Luangwa National Game Park where we will spend a few days on safari.

Here you can see Meredith Harrison, Rachel Dominiski, Katie Smith, and Rachelle Martindale with some children during the devotional at our last clinic at Kabilenge.

Richard Duke